Bredesen Announces Recovery Act Funds for Johnson City Transit System $9.7 Million in Recovery Act Funds Awarded to Eight Small Urban Transit Providers

NASHVILLE – Governor Phil Bredesen announced today that the Johnson City Transit System (JCTS) will receive $1,472,011 in funds from the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act for transit services in the Johnson City area. JCTS operates several fixed routes and paratransit services including demand-response call-in service and the BUCSHOT Service on and around the East Tennessee State University campus.

“Many Tennesseans, particularly those with limited mobility, already rely on public transportation for their daily needs and many others would like to see expanded transit options,” said Bredesen. “The Recovery Act funds announced today will help our small urban transit providers in Tennessee improve service and replace aging fleets with safer, more reliable vehicles.”

A total of $9.7 million in Recovery Act funds is being provided to eight small urban transit agencies in Tennessee.

JCTS plans to use the Recovery Act funds to replace seven low-floor 30-foot buses and five paratransit vans, as well as the purchase of four bus shelters and automatic vehicle-location technology.

“Many of the vans and buses in the state’s transit fleets have accumulated hundreds of thousands of miles over the years and have outlasted their useful life,” said TDOT Commissioner Gerald Nicely. “Replacing these vehicles will allow transit agencies to provide safer, more dependable service to their customers and will generate manufacturing work for the companies providing the vehicles.”

Federal Recovery Act transit funds are administered by TDOT’s Division of Multimodal Transportation Resources. Tennessee received a total of $72 million in Recovery Act transit funds. Of those funds, $42.2 million was directed by the federal government to the state’s four large urban areas, Memphis, Nashville, Chattanooga and Knoxville.
